2nd Asia Food and Beverage Summit 2016

7-8 November, 2016 | Jakarta, Indonesia

A stronger, more confident ASEAN food and beverage industry

The food and beverage industry continues to demonstrate resilience in the face of a lackluster global economy. In the ASEAN, which is recording one of the fastest growths, member countries are breaking down barriers to trade by working to align their food regulations and standards as a major step in the process to create a freer flow of products regionally and globally.

Of these, the agreement on common food safety measures takes priority for the ASEAN bloc, to ensure all traded food, beverage, and agricultural products go through recommended procedures and guidelines. The industry takes an active role in facilitating the adoption of such measures for the development of a common food safety control system that will raise product quality and encourage further investments.

The health and nutrition sector, in particular, has made substantial progress in harmonizing its standards in efforts to advance trade of health supplements and functional foods in Southeast Asia. The standards cover labeling, communication, manufacturing, and criteria for ingredients used in supplements marketed in the region.

These developments are transforming the region's food and beverage sector into a more confident and highly competitive market that also aims to achieve greater transparency in due course.

The market is buoyed by a demographic dominated by consumers seeking products that can prevent or manage health issues. To some extent, trends in clean and clear labeling are catching on in countries like Thailand, Malaysia, the Philippines, and Singapore. Most Asian consumers now consider it important for products to be made with natural colors and flavors, lower fat and sodium content, as well as with more recognizable ingredients.

In processing, newer technologies highlight overall efficiency to cut production cost. Complete lines for snackfood, meat and poultry, bakery, sauces and condiments, to name a few, can carry out the work at greater speed and efficiency. Entry-level automated solutions, on the other, are gaining headway for use by SMEs, which currently account for about 97 percent of the food and beverage industry.

Estimated to reach some US$282.6 billion this year, the global packaging market is focused on developing more flexible materials and smart packaging designed to extend shelf life of fresh or raw products; more lightweight rigid plastic packaging and beverage cans to cut down on raw material consumption; and functional designs that draw attention to products. The application of green or sustainable packaging continues to expand.
